STORAGE FOR FALL CROPS MAY BE GOOD IDEA

Should I store my crops — or sell at harvest time?

That's an oft-asked question in Virginia, and one to which there is no pat answer. But agricultural experts at VPI say storing crops and selling later often pays.

For instance, for the past several years wheat prices have risen an average of 22c per bushel between harvest time and the following April. It probably will cost, including interest on the wheat itself, about 12c per bushel to store, assuming that conditions are such that the wheat will not lose grade.

From October 1, April last year the price of corn rose 25 cents, and similar rises were recorded for soybeans.

However, the experts warn that unsound storage can be costly.Whether grain is fed or sold. Spoilage from insects, rodents, and weather can be tremendous. Insect damage to stored corn in Virginia alone amounts to a yearly loss of over $1,000,000. So, if you do store crops, be sure the storage facilities are properly constructed and protected from insect and rodent damage.
